It has been shown that the method of characterization as presented here, can be used to quantitatively determine the strength of collagen. By subjecting the hydrogel to a tensile stress and then monitoring the deformation of the gel during tensile stress, it is possible to determine the relative strength of collagen at different locations in a hydrogel. One of the most attractive aspects of the proposed method is the ability to specifically track the changes of mechanical properties in the hydrogel when exposed to a concentrated force. While the forces on the cell in the hydrogel are much less than those used in the experiment, it is possible to visualize the effect on the compressive strength of the hydrogel itself. It is possible to extract the instantaneous Young's modulus of the material at different positions on the glass coverslip. In future studies, we plan to replace the calcium alginate monomer with other hyal
