British intelligence services tracked the location of the Chelsea bomber's iPhone the night before the attack, it has been reported. Two days before he carried out the attack, the mobile was used to browse the British far-right community's usual website, The Daily Stormer. This would seem to be a significant clue that the attacker was deeply immersed in far-right propaganda and ideology. The theory, asserted by media website The Telegraph, is that the bomber may have used the mobile to receive a politically motivated far-right website. Then, it's thought, he sent out the attack remotely to his targets, either using radical right-wing WhatsApp groups or by going to classified chat forums to share his plans. The claim comes from sources inside the British security services. The Telegraph report comes in the wake of U.K. security services axing their special propaganda division Zello, which put out livestreams of far-right gang attacks on Muslims and minorities in the U.K. The attack itself was carried out by a lone wolf. The Mail reports that the attack was carried out with a home-made explosive device, and that the bomber was an animal rights activist who had spoken about wanting "to do some harm." While the British security services are conducting a major review of their work in the wake of the attack, media reports are increasing in their speculations about the government's role in the attack. Such reports look ahead to Theresa May's summer retirement as prime minister. Speculation has increased in recent days about the possibility that May's replacement will be Boris Johnson, the former London mayor who resigned in July. There has been speculation about Johnson's extreme right-wing views, and about his links to populist radical and white nationalist circles. The Telegraph reports that Johnson has regularly communicated through encrypted messaging app Wickr. Previous reports of the informant are difficult to verify and his identity is not
